House Committee Hears Prevailing Wage Arguments

On March 22, the House Labor and Industry committee held a public hearing on the Pennsylvania prevailing wage law. The hearing did not focus on any particular legislation, but the questions asked by committee members mirrored bills that have been introduced. The questions pertained to the following ideas:

- Raising the prevailing wage threshold
- Allowing local governments to opt out of the law's provisions
- Changing the definition of "maintenance" to specifically exclude road milling
- Placing a moratorium on the law for several years
- Regularly conducting surveys to determine the wage rates
- Substituting the Occupational Wage rates from the Department of Labor and Industry as the de facto prevailing wage rates
- Outright repeal of the law

The groups that testified against prevailing wage included the ABC, the Commonwealth Foundation (a conservative think tank), the PA School Boards Association and a panel representing the local government associations. Each group criticized the law and endorsed one or more of the changes listed above.

Testifying in support of the law was a panel of building trades representatives led by Frank Sirianni, President of the PA State Building Trades. Also supporting the law was a panel of both union and non-union contractors that work on prevailing wage projects. The panel included John Wanner who represents the interest of the unionized construction interests in Harrisburg and James Gaffney of Goshen Mechanical. led by John Wanner who represents the interest of the unionized construction interests in Harrisburg. The pro-prevailing wage panels emphasized how the law protects local businesses and workers by providing them with a level playing field. States that do not have prevailing wage laws experience a higher percentage of public work going to low wage-paying contractors from other states.

There is no bill scheduled for a vote at this time. However, our lobbyists anticipate that the House Labor and Industry will bring up an anti-prevailing wage bill sometime in the near future.

Joint Legislative Conservation Committee Holds Hearing on Green Building

The committee held an informational forum on March 7 to discuss future initiatives in green building. The Green Building Association of Central Pennsylvania presented information in three parts: description of Leadership in Energy & Environmental Design (LEED), PA forestry industry's place in LEED, and legislative interests.
