Prevailing Wage Package Introduced

It's still early in the current legislative session and bills are being introduced at a break neck pace. Among them are a number of House bills that propose to exempt various types of public projects from the state prevailing wage law. Most of those bills were voted on in the House Labor and Industry last session but never made it to a floor vote in that Chamber.

On the Senate side, a new package of bills was introduced by Senator Lloyd Smucker (Republican, Lancaster Co.) that reflects a different approach being advanced by the anti-prevailing wage forces. SB 272 amends the PA Prevailing Wage Act by redefining "public work." The new definition says that public work begins at $200,000, effectively raising the threshold. Senate Bill 273 would tie the prevailing wage to the average hourly wage as determined by data submitted by employers on their unemployment compensation tax returns. The last bill in the package, SB 274, redefines "maintenance" in such a way that road repairs (e.g. "road milling") would no longer be subject to prevailing rates.

All three of these bills have been referred to the Senate Labor and Industry Committee. While there is a sense that the Senate as a whole lacks the necessary votes to pass any of the bills, all of them bear monitoring and could come up in committee at any time.

House Advances RACP Debt Reduction Bill

The state House picked up where it left off last fall, overwhelmingly approving a bill Wednesday to decrease the debt cap for an economic development grant program by $600 million, and lining it up as a potential bargaining piece for budget negotiations this spring. The bill, which passed 194-2, would reduce the borrowing cap for the Redevelopment Assistance Capital Projects (RACP) program from $4.05 billion to $3.45 billion immediately, while codifying changes made by the Corbett administration as to how the program is run. Passage of the bill follows the release of RACP funds by the Corbett administration on Monday, after refusing to issue funds and delaying for the past two years. The bill doesn't address long-term annual reductions that would have dropped the cap by another $2 billion over 20 years until it reached $1.5 billion. That idea upset Senate Republicans last session. It was dropped from the current plan in order to get broader support this time around.

Corbett Gets Transportation Funding Debate Moving

Governor Tom Corbett delivered his budget address along with a much anticipated transportation funding plan to the state Legislature on February 5th. The plan would provide a historic boost to funds for repairing the Commonwealth's aging transportation systems, mainly by removing the cap on the Oil Franchise Tax. While it will require 5 years to reach the full funding level, his proposal is expected to generate roughly $1.8 billion of new money annually. That money would be used for highways, bridges, mass transit as well as local government transportation funding. Not surprisingly, the legislative reaction was mixed. Some conservatives immediately branded the Republican Governor's plan a tax increase. Other legislators lamented that the plan was too austere and that the transportation problem actually requires more money than the Governor proposed. In that vein, Senate Transportation Chair, John Rafferty, has legislation that will add even more revenue by increasing license and registration fees.

Advocates for the plan want swift action, asking for final passage before the June 30th Commonwealth budget deadline. But just how quickly things will move remains in doubt. Speculation is that there is already enough political will in the Senate to get it done, but the House is another story. The Governor will need to twist a lot of arms in the PA House to leverage enough support for this much needed program.
